INTRODUCTION

The workshop will address the consequences of a secondpersonal/relational conception of morality for criminal law and criminal procedure. Despite the great importance that those conceptions have gained in contemporary ethics in recent years, it seems to us that their possible implications for criminal law, especially in Germany, are still relatively unexplored. One reason may be the peculiarities of (German) criminal law and its theory, according to which crimes are traditionally understood as wrongs that, normatively speaking, take place solely in the relationship between the offender and the state. Consequently, in substantive criminal law, the victim has, strictly speaking, no right or other individual entitlement against the offender not to be harmed. And in criminal proceedings it is the state that decides on criminal prosecution and the prosecutor does not need to make her decision based on what she deems to be in the victim's will (or interest), but on what is necessary to maintain public order.

We believe that second-personal or relational approaches in ethics, as developed by Stephen Darwall or Jay Wallace, challenge this traditional understanding and can be a fruitful basis for normative theorising in criminal law. Therefore, in this workshop, we bring together philosophers concerned with second-personal/relational morality and legal philosophers and theorists from both the Anglo-American and German legal traditions to explore the guestion of the extent to which a second-personal/ relational understanding of morality can or should shape our understanding of criminal law and criminal procedure. Their presentations address either questions about the theoretical foundations of criminal law, doctrinal guestions of substantive criminal law or the structure of criminal procedure.
